This book began, quite unexpectedly, while viewing Etruscan pottery at the National Museum of Tarquinia, during my participation in the Summer School of the American Academy in Rome in 2001, under the inspirational direction of Ann Vasaly. Jeffrey Henderson, always enthusiastic, encouraging, and gracious with his time, was the ideal guide as I began this project in its nascent form as a dissertation. The Department of Classical Studies at Boston University deserves many, many thanks, especially Wolfgang Haase, Patricia Johnson, Steve Scully, and Zsuzsanna Várhelyi. I owe a special debt of gratitude to Ilaria Marchesi, my friend and colleague at Hofstra University, for her strong, consistent support in both my didactic and scholarly pursuits. Bryan Reardon read this work in its early stages as a dissertation, and has been a most cordial, enthusiastic correspondent. Tim Whitmarsh and Catherine Connors have been careful, sensitive readers, and this book's strengths are due to their recommendations and insights. I extend my most heartfelt gratitude to Maaïke Zimmerman, whom I met in Rethymnon in 2005, and who has since been a wonderful colleague and an enthusiastic, nurturing, and scrupulous editor. Bill and Joanne Wilde deserve special mention for their love and support. I will be forever grateful to my parents Steven and Kathleen Smith for giving me the tools to discover and pursue this path. Finally, I express my lasting love and affection to Richard Wilde, without whom none of this would be possible.
